The two brides attended the same high school in Schenectady; were born on the same date, Aug. 28; were baptized by the same cleric, Rev. H. F. Thornberry, Schenectady, and both teach in the same Sunday School, Baptist in Schenectady. Thus, they wanted to be married at the same time by the same minister.

Army and Navy Consent to Test of Bomb Which Inventor Claims Is Deadliest Ever Made by Man

WASHINGTON, March 19 (AP).—The War and Navy Departments, represented as skeptical but open to conviction, consented Monday to tests to determine whether a new type of liquid oxygen bomb is the most deadly destroyer yet devised by man or merely a substitute equivalent of the TNT now in general military use.

Lester P. Barlow, energetic, middle-aged Baltimore inventor, won a show-down on the question when he faced Secretary of War Woodring and Secretary of Navy Edison across a congressional committee table Monday and asked for a chance to prove that he and a collaborator developed a bomb capable of keeping any enemy 1,000 miles from American shores

Members of the House and Senate Naval and Military Committees who jammed their way into the packed committee room were pledged to secrecy on details of the meeting, but they reported "acrimonious" discussion between the inventor and the cabinet officers.

Much of the discussion, members reported, centered on whether Barlow had ever made a formal offer to submit his invention to the armed forces without consideration of his $700,000 World War patent infringement claim against the government.

Upshot of the session, called to consider a proposal for a congressional investigation of Barlow's bomb, was an announcement that a thorough test would be conducted on land and sea as soon as possible Witnesses will include Army and Navy officials and two members each from the House and Senate Naval and Military Committees.

After the closed session newspapermen were called in to hear Don McCloud, Carbondale, Ill., manufacturer of liquid oxygen explosives, express the opinion that liquid oxygen and carbon, major components of Barlow's bomb, were little, if any, more powerful than TNT.

McCloud said he had been experimenting with the military possibilities of the explosive for about a year at the request of the War Department and had developed a bomb in collaboration with G. A. Lewis of New York.

He had applied for patents, he added, and had agreed to turn them over to the government without charge.

Lewis told reporters he and McCloud had come to Washington to "debunk" Barlow's claims.

Barlow, head of the bomb division of the Glenn L. Martin Company's Baltimore plant, said he would be "willing to bet" that a 1,000 pound bomb of his manufacture would kill all men on a battleship in exposed positions if exploded within 200 or 300 feet of the ship. The bombs could be set, he said, to explode above a ship or below the water line after anti-aircraft resistance had been put out of commission.

A lighter warship, he asserted, "wouldn't have a chance," while a bomb falling near a troop transport would result in "mass murder."

GRAND JURY BILL PASSES

SPENCER TRACY IN FILM AT PARAMOUNT

The most difficult assignment which a film actor can receive is the portrayal of a historic character of whom the public already has a preconceived mental picture. So declared Spencer Tracy, who has just completed such a role in enacting Major Robert Rogers in "Northwest Passage," the Technicolor adventure film now playing at the Paramount Theatre.

It is Tracy's third successive portrayal of a historic character. As Major Rogers he stepped back 180 years to characterize the most famous Indian fighter of all time, an almost legendary figure about whom tall tales of all kinds had sprung up, a figure brought into the ken of the reading public through Kenneth Roberts' best-selling novel.

Leonards Home from South; Term Weather Extremely Unpleasant

Prof. and Mrs. Walter B. Leonard have returned to their home, 34 Sanford Street, after spending the Winter in the South. Prof. Leonard, who has spent many seasons in the South, said the present season was the most unpleasant, in regard to climatic conditions, he has ever experienced. He said it was impossible to keep warm because of the long and severe spells of cold weather, which we encountered in almost every section of the Southland.

The Leonards spent nine weeks in New Orleans, being present at the Mardi Gras carnival which was poorly attended because of the inclement weather. Three thousand families were without water and gas for several days, water pipes burst all over the city and flooded the sidewalks, freezing, and making the walking perilous. Many left the South as early as February, saying that they could be more comfortable in their Northern homes, where they could at least keep warm at night. Prof. Leonard said a resident of New Orleans casually remarked that there are but two prevailing conditions in the South: "Ideal and Unusual."

LESTER P. BARLOW

By NEA Service

America's hardy perennial in the field of unrecognized military genius is up again with a new idea. He is Lester P. Barlow, who shows up about this time of year with ideas like unsinkable battleships or irresistible explosives. This time it is the latter, and he's getting a play because there's a war on and Congress is in a state of "nerves."

Barlow carries on his work a mile from the Glenn L. Martin airplane factory near Baltimore, and has named his explosive glmite, the first three letters honoring Martin's initials.

The bomb is a liquid oxygen-carbon explosive. Detonating waves do the destructive work usually accomplished by flying fragments of conventional bombs, he says.

Liquid air explosives have failed to excite military men in the past because liquid air has a tendency to evaporate quickly, so that a shipment of bombs leaving the arsenal well loaded might be so many empty cartridges by the time they reach the flying field.
